The Day India’s Walls Became Instruments Against Women

A time when political leaders across the world are promising to work for gender parity, an act of vandalism in Gwalior India makes it grimly clear that women’s dignity is still revered as dispensable. When public murals depicting women doing yoga are sexually desecrated, it raises a chilling question: If depictions don’t go unharmed, what protection is there for real women on the streets of everyday life or far worse, in conflict zones like Indian Illegally Occupied Jammu and Kashmir? This is how casual acts of violation wield the enforcer’s lash of systemic oppression and cut through the fabric of progress.

The truth is as grim as it is chilling, as a beautification project for the city, these black silhouettes with women doing yoga appeared on the buildings representing health and strength for women everywhere. However, these harmless Works of Art were defaced with sexual body parts scratched out representing the female figure being sexually belittled in this act of vandalism that was specifically aimed at women everywhere. A student took it to social media with her own reaction to the vandalism stating her utter revulsion and rage at the attitudes expressed through this act of vandalism. The incident received increased attention on social media with a commenter wryly remarking “Even the paintings should be contained within and covered up!” Bitter truth in the form of sarcasm highlights an indelible truth in every situation in life: the degradation of images of women normalizes their objectification in the real world. Women in every corner of the world whether in Delhi, France, London, Seoul or Karachi would feel the same sense of revulsion as the message goes beyond religious, cultural and geographical differences. It is not about Muslim, Hindu or Christian women. It is simply about woman in general period. The message being sent is both universal and horrifying there is no place that is protected from this type of violence, including in symbolic representation.

The incident perfectly represents the paradox of a country like India, that cannot provide adequate protection for even a basic work of art. Instead of taking responsibility for investigating those responsible for the defacement and creating awareness about these types of incidents officials opted for the low cost, low effort solution of painting over the entire wall, thereby eliminating both the evidence of the acts of vandalism as well as the original artwork.

This type of targeted defacing of public art is considered a sexual harassment of public representing a larger trend of violence against women and creates a social environment that enables individuals to vandalize with little fear of being punished. There are many terrifying statistics about the different types of violence against women in our society today: However, there is also hope and that hope comes from a grassroots movement. The youth of today have refused to accept or excuse the violence inflicted on women and are demanding change like in Gwalior a College Student took action by using paint and brushes to return dignity to the yoga murals that were destroyed. Although courageous actions of many young individuals will help create a new awareness, courage alone cannot replace institutional reform.

India prides itself on being the world’s largest democracy yet its true measure lies not in lofty constitutions but in the everyday conduct toward its women citizens. India’s treatment of women extends beyond neglected vandalization to state sanctioned demotion. In Dec 2025, Bihar Chief Minister Nitish Kumar, ripped off the hijab from the head of a Muslim women doctor at an event in Patna. This public act of humiliation caused outrage across India but the laughter of some officials at the event and lack of any serious outcome for Kumar, indicates a growing trend (silent) in India on the violation of the right to make individual decisions regarding one’s body in public by those holding high office. This trend does not just affect Muslim women, but represents a problem affecting all women throughout the entire world, including women in Indian Illegally Occupied Jammu and Kashmir and promotes the idea that humiliation in public is normal, and therefore goes against the principle of equality and respect for all citizens of the nation.

The whitewashed walls may fade from people’s memory, and headlines yet the questions posed by these walls burn brighter than ever. If authorities fail to defend women from sexual objectification through artistic representations within their own jurisdiction? What level of credibility do those same authorities possess in terms of providing protection for women’s rights in other areas of the world, including territories under oppression? Especially Indian Illegally Occupied Jammu and Kashmir, where India has deployed hundreds and thousands of occupational forces. The simple answer is “zero credibility” unless and until the persistent mindset is eliminated. Until that point, women far and wide will continue to live in a world where their dignity is constantly hovered. The paint may be gone, but the truth it exposed will keep pushing us toward real justice and equivalency.

Did Trump Avoid Israel’s Iran Trap?

The Middle East has been subjected to a destructive and repetitive doctrine that promises peace through regime change but delivers only chaos, fragmentation, and endless war. At the core of this ideology stands Benjamin Netanyahu, whose long-held belief is that Israel’s security and regional dominance require the dismantling of hostile governments rather than coexistence with them. From Iraq to Libya, from Syria to Afghanistan, from Lebanon to Gaza, this toxic philosophy has left entire societies in ruins—yet it is being recycled once again, this time against Iran.

Israel’s current military campaign in Gaza and the West Bank, its permanent occupation of the Golan Heights, its repeated strikes inside Syria, and its confrontations with Lebanon all reveal a broader expansionist vision. However, Netanyahu understands that without neutralizing Iran—the only regional power capable of resisting Israeli military dominance—this vision cannot fully materialize. This is why Iran has been framed as an “existential threat,” and why regime change in Tehran has become a central obsession.

At that critical moment, Donald Trump did not endorse regime change in Iran. He resisted plunging the United States into another open-ended conflict. However, Israel did not abandon its objective. Instead, it adopted a two-pronged strategy: destabilization from within and the grooming of a manufactured alternative leadership for Iran.

According to Iranian authorities, the current unrest was not merely spontaneous protest but was instigated, coordinated, and guided by Israeli intelligence networks operating under Mossad. Tehran presented evidence that Mossad-linked operatives were embedded among protest groups, receiving instructions directly from headquarters in Tel Aviv. These instructions allegedly included plans to incite large-scale rioting, burn banks, destroy ambulances, attack police officers, and sabotage mosques and public infrastructure. The objective was not reform but disorder.

Most critically, Iranian officials revealed that even after the country shut down its domestic internet, communications between these operatives and their handlers continued through satellite-based systems, while Iran simultaneously faced hundreds of thousands of cyberattacks targeting its communications infrastructure. This exposed the operation as a coordinated hybrid assault combining street violence, cyber warfare, and psychological pressure.

When this evidence was reportedly shown to President Trump, his initial posture hardened. He openly stated that all options remained on the table. However, the situation shifted when Iran halted scheduled executions and refrained from further mass repression. Trump himself publicly stated that executions had been stopped and that there would be no further oppressive measures against protesters. With that declaration, he effectively poured cold water on Netanyahu’s attempt to maneuver the United States into another Middle Eastern war.

Parallel to the destabilization campaign, Israel simultaneously cultivated a political alternative: Reza Pahlavi, the son of Iran’s former monarch. Pahlavi has lived outside Iran since the age of twelve, spending his entire adult life in the United States. He has no organic political base inside Iran, no demonstrated grassroots support, and no tangible connection to the daily struggles of the Iranian people. For decades, he remained politically irrelevant. Suddenly, amid unrest, he was reintroduced as a “savior.”

Despite living a luxurious lifestyle in the United States without any clearly defined source of income, Pahlavi has been aggressively promoted as a viable leader for Iran. He was invited to Jerusalem, where, in interviews with Israeli media, he openly spoke about historical alignment between Iran, Israel, and the Jewish people. In doing so, he publicly positioned himself as ideologically aligned with Israel’s regional agenda. This appearance confirmed that he has effectively sold himself as a convenient figurehead—offered the illusion of kingship in exchange for political obedience.

This two-pronged Israeli strategy—instigating large-scale unrest while simultaneously presenting a pre-selected alternative ruler—mirrors earlier regime-change playbooks used elsewhere. However, it is fundamentally flawed. Reza Pahlavi does not represent modern Iran. He has no roots in today’s Iranian society, no institutional backing inside the country, and no legitimacy among a population that has lived through revolution, war, sanctions, and resistance. Attempting to impose him as a solution only exposes the artificial nature of the entire project.

More dangerously, an attack on Iran would not resemble Iraq or Libya. Iran controls or influences critical waterways and trade corridors. It possesses strategic depth, hardened military infrastructure, and powerful allies. Any war would immediately draw in Russia and China, turning a regional conflict into a global economic and military crisis. Energy markets would collapse, supply chains would fracture, and the United States would face overstretch and humiliation rather than victory.

While the U. S. mainland may be geographically distant, American military bases across the Middle East and beyond remain well within Iran’s reach. Moreover, if Iran preserves even part of its nuclear infrastructure under such pressure, the eventual consequences for Israel could be far more severe than anything Netanyahu anticipates. A cornered Iran is not a defeated Iran.

At this moment, the United States is already deeply entangled elsewhere—in Venezuela, in the Greenland controversy in the Arctic, amid internal unrest over federal enforcement actions, and as the credibility of NATO and the United Nations continues to erode. Being dragged into another war engineered by Netanyahu would contradict every principle of “America First.”

This is the moment for the United States to free itself from external pressure groups, including AIPAC, and to pursue an independent foreign policy grounded in national interest rather than ideological entanglements. The Middle East does not need another regime destroyed. It needs restraint, realism, and an end to expansionist fantasies that have already devastated an entire region.

History has already judged the regime-change doctrine. The only question now is whether the United States will finally refuse to repeat it.

Kashmir: The Final Demographic War Against a Nation

Mushtaq Ahmad Butt

Kashmir today is no longer a territorial dispute frozen on the world map. It has morphed into the final onslaught against an entire people’s identity and existence. India’s contemporary strategy aims, after military occupation, to reduce Kashmiri Muslims into a minority on their own land and then erode their history, culture, language, and collective memory to the point where the territory remains—but the nation disappears from history.

This is a war that has moved beyond bullets and armor. It is now waged through laws, notifications, administrative decrees, and demographic engineering. In the 21st century, nations are not erased by tanks—they are erased by demographic reconfiguration.

The revocation of Articles 370 and 35A in 2019 was the first decisive legal strike. It opened the gates for external settlement and transformed Kashmir’s status from a disputed region under international commitments into a field for demographic experimentation. What followed was a sweeping campaign of land seizures, conversion of agricultural estates, construction of industrial zones, establishment of housing colonies, and issuance of hundreds of thousands of new domiciles—each step quietly restructuring the valley’s demographic and political landscape.

Yet perhaps the most painful silence is the silence of the Muslim world. A global community once described as a single body now refuses to feel the pain of its wounded limb. The indifference of more than fifty Muslim states adds salt to the wounds of Kashmiri identity. It is not mere weakness—it is history’s indictment.

Today Kashmiri youth find themselves fighting not only bullets, but time, demography, and indifference. They understand a simple reality: bullets kill a generation, but demographic alteration wipes out a nation. Hence the struggle has reached the final line between survival and annihilation.

History testifies that revolutions are not always born from arms—they also emerge from shame, awakening, or the sudden ignition of collective conscience. Kashmir today demands precisely that awakening from us.

The real question, therefore, is not what India is doing—but what we are doing. India may not win Kashmir through military victory, but through global and regional silence. If this silence persists, future generations will not ask how many bullets were fired—they will ask why Kashmir was lost. And perhaps the answer will be: Kashmir fell not to force, but to the world’s silence.

Nature does not forgive spectators, and history does not spare silent nations.

Kashmir is no longer asking for pity—it is asking for voice. Because there are moments in history when voice itself becomes the first brick of revolution.

Otherwise, as the poet warned: “Moments erred—and centuries paid the price.”

This is the moment when Kashmir no longer needs spectators—it needs participants. The time has come for every segment of society to break the silence and assume responsibility. The time has come for:

- intellectuals to write
- media to speak
- youth to rise
- the Ummah to awaken

For Kashmir is no longer a routine political dispute. It is an ongoing human tragedy and the trial of a dying national identity. Its answer will not be found in vague statements and diplomatic formalities but in collective awareness, international intervention, and moral responsibility.

The decision will not be made by the world—it must be made by us.

Urgent need for conducive tax
environment to broaden tax net: RCCI

Commerce Desk

RAWALPINDI: Emphasizing the urgent need for a conducive and business-friendly tax environment to effectively broaden the tax net, the Rawalpindi Chamber of Commerce & Industry (RCCI) hosted a high-level meeting with a visiting delegation of the Regional Tax Office (RTO), led by Ms. Farhat Qayyum, Chief Commissioner, RTO. RCCI highlighted that Pakistan currently has one of the highest tax rates in the region, which poses serious challenges to business growth and competitiveness.

Addressing the gathering, RCCI President Usman Shaukat stressed that sustainable economic growth is not possible without a fair, predictable, and growth-oriented tax regime.

He urged the tax authorities to reduce the excessive burden on existing taxpayers, recognize and acknowledge compliant and high tax-paying businesses, and shift the focus towards broadening the tax base instead of repeatedly taxing the same segment.

In her remarks, Chief Commissioner Ms. Farhat Qayyum appreciated RCCI's constructive and pragmatic recommendations for broadening the tax net and sought the Chamber's continued cooperation in improving tax compliance and revenue collection.

She informed the participants that digitization reforms are actively underway to curb malpractices, including digital invoicing and POS system installation, aimed at enhancing transparency and minimizing human intervention.

The meeting was attended by Senior Vice President Khalid Farooq Qazi, Vice President Fahad Barlas, former RCCI Presidents Najam Rehan and Asad Mashadi, members of the Executive Committee, representatives of markets and trade associations, various business sectors, and members of the Tax Bar Association.

Customs Ensures Industry-Wide Implementation of official Bank Exchange Rates For Shipping Charges

Commerce Desk

ISLAMABAD: Pakistan Customs has achieved a historic and industry-wide breakthrough by ensuring the application of official bank exchange rates for shipping charges, effectively ending the long-standing practice of arbitrary and excessive billing by international shipping lines.

The All-Pakistan Shipping Association (APSA), through a formal communication on 12 January 2026, has confirmed that all member shipping lines are now charging shipping fees strictly on the basis of exchange rates provided by their respective authorized commercial banks, in accordance with State Bank of Pakistan (SBP) regulations.

This decisive development follows sustained engagement by a high-level committee constituted by Pakistan Customs, which held extensive consultations with shipping agents, terminal operators, trade bodies, and international shipping lines. As a key milestone, Maersk—the largest shipping line operating in Pakistan and handling nearly 26 percent of the country's total cargo—earlier began applying official bank exchange rates, setting a benchmark for the rest of the industry.

Written confirmations of compliance have been received from major international shipping lines and their local agents, including Hapag-Lloyd, Ocean Network Express (ONE), COSCO Shipping, CMA CGM, Mediterranean Shipping Company (MSC), OOCL, and United Marine Agencies, among others, establishing full industry-wide adherence to SBP-compliant exchange rates.

This achievement underscores FBR's firm commitment to safeguarding legitimate trade, promoting ease of doing business, and supporting Pakistan's export-led economic growth through effective regulatory oversight and stakeholder engagement.

F-Class Shooter Mohsin Nawaz highlights sports infrastructure gaps in meeting with Minister Ahsan Iqbal

Tahir Amin Malik

Pakistan's leading F-Class shooter, and Tamgha-e-Imtiaz Mohsin Nawaz, met with Federal Minister for Planning, Development, and Special Initiatives Ahsan Iqbal Chaudhary to outline his vision for youth sports development and address infrastructure gaps in non-traditional sports.

Nawaz, who holds 10 international F-Class individual medals, the most by any Pakistani, shared his ambition to create a platform for training the next generation. He told the minister he wants to pass on the skills and experience he has earned over his two-decade career, emphasizing the need for government support to promote healthy sporting activities among young people.

The shooter's credentials include silver and bronze medals at the 2024 European Long Range Shooting Championship and silver at the 155th NRA UK Imperial Championship. He is the first Pakistani to secure life memberships with both the UK and USA National Rifle Associations and has been nominated for the Tamgha-e-Imtiaz, the first shooter in the country's history to receive such consideration.

Beyond his athletic achievements, Nawaz brings expertise as a certified sports psychologist and emotional wellbeing coach. He stressed that developing sports requires psychological infrastructure alongside physical facilities. "Mental strength is the real weapon," he noted, advocating for support systems that protect athletes from negativity during international competitions. His work also explores how mental state influences metabolic health.

The meeting addressed practical obstacles facing shooters in Pakistan. Nawaz highlighted prohibitive import duties on precision equipment and the absence of adequate training facilities. He proposed that 50-meter ranges in major cities could provide essential training infrastructure if coupled with policy reforms easing equipment acquisition.

Nawaz, who represents KAHLES

Sports Optics and Peregrine Bullets as a global brand ambassador, recently set two national records at the 3rd F-Class National Long Range Shooting Championship in Jhelum. He suggested that reducing customs duties on sporting gear could help Pakistan field competitive shooters for the 2026 World Championship.

Minister Iqbal acknowledged Nawaz's self-made success as a potential template for aspiring athletes and expressed willingness to examine policy options. The discussion signals possible government attention to sports beyond cricket and hockey, though concrete measures remain to be announced.
